WHO WE ARE

The empowerment of international African students is very crucial in the ordinary modern international business-oriented education. Many students feel left behind by their universities, many of them are unsure about their future. They go to university to get a degree in a hope of getting a job. Our NGO is founded to help this student on and off campus. We partner with universities on matters to deal with mental health, fees payment flexibility, seek more scholarships and other area. Africans have realized that tertiary credited degrees alone don't enable them to get their dream job because they lack skills such as, leadership, public speaking skills, and critical thinking. The third gap is the fact that there is no conjunction between what the market needs and what the university delivers. A few programs are launched depending on the need but even then, the curriculum itself isn't designed to fit what the companies expect.

The students are then obliged to face one of the world's oldest paradoxes: to get a job they need experience, to gain experience they need a job With a high youth unemployment rate, 45 percent of university graduates in Africa are jobless. In Nigeria, 23.1 percent of people with undergraduate degrees are unemployed. It takes a university graduate at least five years to get secure job in Tanzania and Kenya.

Six in Tunisia. The statistics are staggering. Our capacity development work is centered on fostering the skills, confidence, and critical insight of policy practitioners to meaningfully engage in policy debates drawing on insights gained from research evidence issues affecting international African students on campus and outside campus.

Most people we support want to add a skill to their developing professional competence and they bring significant practical and academic experience to the process. In response, we adopt a skills-development and adult learning approach that ensures you start in right place, at the right level and have the set of resources and tailored feedback you need to support African international students. We also design to input less and less as you become more competent, we also support international students through UBUNTU philosophy.
